Railroad Travel in Russia.

Railroad travel in Russia reminds one of that in certain sections of the United States, where the roads are very new, the equip ments cheap, the employes inexperienced, and all kinds of accommodations very limted. It was only since the late war in America that Russia has figured at all in railroad circles. The lines built by Winans, of Baltimore, were well built, but they were not well equipped and have been poorly maintained. The arbitrary direction of the czar, that all the lines should be perfectly straight from one large city to the other, or from the beginning to the termini, regardless of the lesser points on the way, will be a great drawback to the country for many years. The stranger's attention is directly attracted to the large number of small cities and important villages he sees from one to five miles off the railroad lines. These marts of trade are more of less substantial, and generations will come and go before the stations are as plentiful along the railroad lines as they would at first have been made but for the interference of the czar.

It is very seldom that a house is provided for locomotives, or there is a shed for any class of material or equipment, notwithstanding the fact that the nine months of rain or snow in each year make them more necessary than in other countries. Locomotives, rusting and falling to pieces, although but a few years old, and tools of every character are seen strewn about everywh re. The stations, however, are commo-dious and comfortable. The fastest express trains, which make about twenty miles an hour, stop at every station from five to forty minutes. The guard comes to your carriage door when the train stops, opens it and tells how long the stop will be. He also points to the restaurant hard by, and tells you what can be purchased, and, further, that there is ample time. It is probable that there is a commission arrangement, on all the railroad restaurants are run by the company. Few passenger trains have not some freight cars. The trains are long, the rails heavy and good, the ballasting fair, but the equipments are so inferior that the employes refuse to make any speed.

But one passenger train a day, even on the principal lines, and very seldom is a sleeping car or a carriage that can be utilized as a sleeper encountered. For a run between two cities distant like New York and Washington, or New York and Boston, America, a day or night of twelve to fourteen hours is consumed. There are seldom closets or drinking water, or similar accommodations. At every station, day or night old women or children visit the carriages and sell drinking water.

There is one comfort, however, on a Russian railway train. There are no cinders. Thought fashioned wood burning locomotives are used, and as they have spark and cinder ure used, and as they have spark and cinder protectors and burn pine or white poplar or similar woods, there is freedom from both cinders and smoke. The roads are too new for dust, too, when there is a period dry enough to make dust.—Moscow Cor. Cleveland Lead Leaders.

The dial is of ground glass, and the lamp behind it lights it up; the effect being enhanced by a flat reflector. A key is included in the circuit to close the current when the light is required. It is obvious that there are circumstances in which such a device will be useful, and where it is inexpedient to strike a light to see the time-such places as mines, or in military operations. The apparatus is equally applicable to clocks.

Observations on the part of a large number of scientists prove that earthquakes are more frequent at the time of full moon and change of the moon than at other times, and also more frequent when the moon is nearest the earth or when she is on the meridian. The cause to which this fact bas been assigned is the action of those forces which produce the tides of the ocean; their similar influence upon the solid land strata leads to their disturbance in the shape of earthquakes.
